Professor Kate Shaw, Contributing Opinion Writer for The New York Times, Urges Biden to Critique The Supreme Court

“The Biden administration has made democracy a central focus of its agenda, and there is good evidence from the midterms that the public actually cares a great deal about democracy as a value,” Shaw wrote. “The court right now is a genuine threat to democracy — to both the choices made by our elected representatives and the processes by which we translate preferences into tangible policy.”

Professor Matthew Wansley Speaks to The New York Times on Potential Problems Caused by Self-Driving Cars

“If you get disabled on a quiet suburban street, you are not in anyone’s way,” Wansley said. “If you’re in the city, it’s a big deal.”

Director of Student Life Francesca Acocella '16 Publishes “Understanding Mental Health Needs of Law Students Post- Pandemic” in AALS Magazine

“In student affairs, we holistically support our students in balancing their personal and academic obligations,” Acocella wrote. “Cardozo Student Services approaches this support daily through emphasizing routines and time management. From orientation through bar support, we teach that time to care for yourself and time to outline are equally important.”
