Professor Alex Reinert Discusses Police Reform and the States in USA Today Op-Ed

"The laws that have already been enacted in a few states, and that are under consideration in a few more, are examples of what state leaders can do if they are truly committed to creating pathways to accountability and reform of a fundamentally flawed civil rights enforcement regime," writes Reinert. Reinert was also a guest on the Institute for Justice's Short Circuit podcast.

Professor Ekow Yankah Discusses the Public Campaign Finance Board's Challenges in Gothamist

"When you pass a statute like this with a grand design it all seems too distant, in the future," Yankah says.

Professor Sam Weinstein Talks to The Washington Post About Frontier/Spirit Merger

"The government could take the view that 'these are the two most important of ultra low-cost carriers and we don't want to see them merged,' but I doubt that would happen," Weinstein says.

Professor Kate Shaw Comments on ABC About SCOTUS and Jan. 6 Committee

"There were some eyebrows raised when Justice Thomas was that lone vote," Shaw says. "But he did not explain himself, so we don't actually know why he wished to take up the case."

Professor Michael Pollack Talks about Justice Breyer in ABA Journal

"Every justice has their own approach to hypotheticals," says Pollack. "Some justices go in the opposite direction of Justice Breyer and go for things that are in the public eye at the moment. I think that can be very effective."
