The Future of Net Neutrality and Broadband Privacy

In April 2017, Congress voted to repeal the FCC Broadband Privacy rules, which would have required cable and telecom companies to give customers more choices about how their data can be collected, used and shared.

In December 2017, the FCC voted to repeal the Net Neutrality rules, which prohibited cable and telecom companies from blocking or slowing down any websites or apps. The Net Neutrality rules also prohibited broadband providers from striking special deals that would give some websites or apps "priority" over others.

This panel will focus on what the recent repeals mean for consumers and the economy and how policymakers should respond.
